OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

The prosperity and beauty of the National Capital—Panorama of Washington—its citizens society and strangers—Political whispers.

WASHINGTON, D. C., DEC. 6, 1879.

The usual winter session of Congress has now fairly begun, and all through the city are indications of a good time coming, or at least expected by the merchant, landlady and the various species of the cormorant tribe. With a wise forethought, the founders of the seat of government reserved a large portion of the land for public purposes, and on the ground thus held there has been erected, from time to time, a collection of government buildings which do credit to the taste and generosity of the nation. The finest structure of all, and, in the opinion of many celebrated authorities on architecture, the finest building in America, is the Capital, designed for the accommodation of the legislative branch of the Government. This superb building, with its vast dome, ranking fifth in height and fourth in diameter among similar structures, its wings of marble with their long lines of Corinthian columns, its artistic embellishments without and within, and imposing deliberative chambers impresses a visitor as fitly symbolical of a great and prosperous commonwealth. The liberal spaces of the building are devoted to the House of Representatives and the Senate Chamber, with their clerk, committee and document ante-rooms, to the court room of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to the Congressional Library, the largest collection of books in the country. The perversity of a city's growth is proverbial. In the case of Washington this is strikingly exemplified by a movement westward, to the rear of the capital, which is thus left to face a very inferior section of the city, while turning its back on the real town. A mile to the west, interrupting the sweep of Pennsylvania Avenue, stand a cluster of noble buildings, comprising the Treasury, the State, Army and Navy Departments, and the Executive Mansion. Perhaps "noble" is not the fittest epithet by which to characterize the last named of these structures, unless we attach to the word its meaning as an adjective of republican simplicity. A less imposing palace for a sovereign could scarcely have been built, and, architecturally, the White House is inferior to many private residences in the district. The older buildings reflect the partiality of the last generation for the classic order of architecture. The Treasury and Patent Office are fine specimens of Grecian Ionic and Doric. But the immense new building, which, in one connected whole, gives accommodation to the three departments of the Army, Navy and Foreign Affairs, is in the style of the Renaissance, as are many of the lesser buildings erected of late years. The cost of these structures has been enormous, but it is a source of gratification to reflect that the large expenditures of money have not been the cause of a scandal, as has been too often the case with similar disbursements for public improvements. By the valuation of property in the District of Columbia, just published for the current year, the aggregate for the Government reaches the total of seventy-eight million dollars against a total of seventy-four millions for the community proper. Of this large sum, the Capitol has cost thirteen million dollars, and the State Department, to date, about seven millions.

The society of Washington takes the motley complexion of its official visitors. The body of the community get their living in one way or another from the executive or legislative branches of the Government and reflect their peculiarities. It is, I suppose, the most democratic city in existence. The suffixes and affixes which strike a respectable terror to the heart of the provincial citizen, have no spell here, where familiarity has done her perfect work. We are all Cols. and Hons. and Judges, by social brevet, if nothing more, and having thus satisfactorily settled questions of rank, we estimate a neighbor rather for what he is than for what his constituents expect him to be. The effects of this democratic spirit are often amusing and probably quite shocking to one who cannot comprehend, or who has no sympathy with, the genius of our institutions, but, these once understood and liked, the extravagance, vulgarity and crudity of the Capital's society finds more than a balance in the courage, strength, fraternity and hopeful progress everywhere visible.

The President had conversations again to-day with his party friends on the subject of his financial recommendations, in which he reiterated the sentiments expressed by him yesterday. He laughed at the idea of the matter producing any split in the Republican party. In regard to the English mission, he said that nothing definite had been determined.

Senator Don Cameron is getting up a grand excursion to visit Philadelphia on the 16th of this month, when Gen. Grant will be there. He has consulted with the leaders of both parties, and it is probable that there will be an adjournment of Congress for the purpose. Cameron wants about two thousand people to go from here.

AUGUST.

A PLEA FOR ELOCUTION.

Health is the pearl of great price. No other earthly blessing can be placed beside it, and without it everything else loses its charm. Anything, therefore, which can aid in acquiring this blessing we shall, if we are wise and thoughtful, hail with delight.

Nervous diseases and frail constitutions are becoming every day more abundant, and hollow chests, round shoulders, and crookings of the collar bone, particularly among our young girls, are coming to be painfully common sights. Nor will these cease until an intelligent hygiene shall furnish the true preventive.

We wish our young people to possess health, symmetry of form, a proper carriage of the body, and agreeable and pleasant voices; and yet, as a rule, absolutely nothing is said about these matters in our schools, and the whole term of school life is allowed to be absorbed with cramming the often already overtaxed brain. Is this wise?

Hamlet is made to say by our far-seeing Shakespeare, "Whilst this machine is to him, Hamlet." The machine of which he speaks is the body; and any wise system of education must recognize the importance of keeping this machine in its best condition if we would get from it its best and most effective work. To cultivate the brain while we neglect the vital powers is a narrow policy and must surely in the end lead to mischief.

At the basis of any intelligent study of elocution we place physical development; and we claim that every scholar in every school in the land would be benefited by a system of physical training. Not only do we claim that there would be a direct gain in the personal appearance of the scholar by such a system, but we claim also that he would be made brighter, happier and more ready to grapple with his studies. How many girls are told anything in our schools about the important matter of breathing? and yet it is asserted that not more than one-half of the ladies of our time breathe properly; that not more than one-third of the lung capacity is brought into use; and that from this cause alone many diseases are engendered. Indeed, one prominent physician has declared that could our girls be taught to breathe correctly, as a habit, very many diseases which our common among us would be entirely avoided.

Intimately connected with the function of breathing is that of vocalization; and it is perhaps because the culture of the voice involves the development of the lungs that vocal exercises are so generally acknowledged as contributing to health.

The voice is the index of the vital part of the nature. A weak voice, as a rule, indicates a delicate state of health. With a strong voice we associate a robust condition of the body. Reasoning reflectively, we conclude that if we can strengthen a weak voice we, at the same time, strengthen the general bodily powers, and this is so. Time and space would fail me to tell of the many instances which have come under my own observation in which this has been proven to be the case.

I have said nothing in this necessarily brief talk with regard to the mental aspect of the subject; but anyone who will take the trouble to examine the matter carefully will, I think, readily acknowledge that a course of elocutionary training, intelligently pursued, does much not only to quicken the perceptive faculties but also to strengthen the imaginative powers and to vitalize the moral nature. Children and older pupils should be taught to read not words but thoughts.

We are glad to see that the attention of wise and cultivated educators is being directed to this subject, and, to quote the words of a recent writer, we ought not to cease agitating until there is a system of physical and vocal culture established in all our high schools and colleges.—New England Paper.
